Mozart’s opera The Magic Flute has always been an opera I have longed to direct. I enjoy challenges and this opera has challenged stage directors for hundreds of years, as it can often be misinterpreted. The design team of Anna Treusch and Ming Wong have decided to look at this opera from the perspective of the universal balance in life. These themes pervade the entirety of this piece though are not always equally presented in such ways. We (fans of opera) have been brought up with decided opinions about the Queen of the Night and Sarastro, but I believe that stage interpretations and tradition have removed certain flexibilities which exist both in the libretto and the story itself. I would love to leave the students with a firm grasp of what this story is about and how they themselves can hopefully pull truths that will carry them forward in their careers.
I am fortunate to build on the relationship that was formed during last season’s Die Fledermaus by working again with Maestro Nathan Brock. Together, we are looking at another work which is a great opera for students by providing the opportunity to learn several skills which are required to be an opera singer in today’s world. Performers must sing in German (a must), speak, and deliver dialogue which engages the audience and finally bring across themes of Mozart’s day to our current times.

For this production, we have decided to sing in German and have the dialogue spoken in English. This will both give the singers the practical experience of working in one of opera’s crucial languages and will give them the opportunity to hone their acting technique.

I hope you will enjoy this take on Mozart’s The Magic Flute.

- Joel Ivany
